ENGLISH CATHEDRALS

The vast majority of England's Anglican cathedrals were built long before the Victorian and Edwardian eras. The only one to be erected during the Victorian period is Truro, while the construction of Liverpool began in Edwardian times. However, many cathedrals were restored, remodelled, or enlarged in the 19th century, a large number under the supervision of Sir George Gilbert Scott. Other active restoration architects include Sir Arthur William Blomfield, John Loughborough Pearson and George Edmund Street. Many cathedrals had heating added, usually by warm air stoves, during restoration.

By way of contrast, the Victorian period saw the building of many new Roman Catholic cathedrals. The architects were usually practising Catholics and include Augustus Welby Northmore Pugin, Edward Welby Pugin, Joseph Aloysius Hansom, George Goldie and Edward Goldie.

The listing of English cathedrals is arranged in alphabetical order with construction or principal restoration (in italics), followed by the name, in italics, of the principal architect for the construction or restoration works:
